It is fitting that the University of Glasgow, in this celebration of its ninth jubilee, should recollect with pride the privilege it happily exercised a hundred and forty-five years ago of lending a helping hand, and extending the beneficent solace of personal friendly intercourse of professors of mathematics, philosophy, and classical literature, and giving a workshop within its walls, to as young man of no university education, struggling to commence earning a livelihood as a mathematical-instrument-maker, in whom they discovered something of the genius, destined for such great things in future. James Watt's paternal grandfather, Thomas Watt, was the son of an Aberdeenshire farmer, who died in battle in one of the wars of Montrose early in the seventeenth century. As a poor orphan, he was rescued from destitution by benevolent relatives of whom no records are known. He settled in Carsedyke as a teacher of navigation, or Professor of the Mathematicks, as he was styled on his tombstone. Carsedyke, on the site of the present Port-Glasgow, was a borough of barony under a charter of Charles II. (1669), a mile or two from Greenock, to which a charter had been granted by Charles I. thirty-four years earlier (1635).
