We have seen how the wind carries the pollen of the osage-orange tree; but there are other ways in which the pollen is carried. Tarry by the roadside and watch the insects as they go from flower to flower in search of the sweet liquid which we call honey. At the same Stamens shedding pollen before the stigma is at a later stage; the stigma is ready or ready to receive it. pollen but the stamens are withered. time that the insect gathers honey for himself, he pays his way all unconsciously by carrying pollen for the flowers. It makes no difference to the flower how the pollen is carried so long as it reaches the other flower and is deposited in the proper place. With this in mind it is interesting to note also that insects usually go from one flower to another of the same sort, thus taking the right kind of pollen to the stigma waiting to receive it. Pollen from the corn, for example, would be useless on the stigma of the squash. The butterfly may be seen sipping honey from blossom to blossom of the thistle (Fig. 9), while the bee is busy near by at the buckwheat or columbine (Fig. 10). They are not stealing sweets as we often hear it said; they are / simply helping themselves to the feast the flower has spread for them. Early spring flowers...
