And the cells themselves, being firm and somewhat condensed, remained in their natural position when sections were made from the fresh liver, and were not smeared over the freshly-cut surface of the section by the action of the knife. The previous hardening of the tissue, so strongly advocated in cutting thin sections of the liver, cannot be carried out as part of the method which I have been led to adopt, and the thinnest sections prepared by hardening are thicker than those obtained by my plan, and, although the latter is very difficult to carry out, is attended by many failures, and requires great patience; when one does succeed, the specimen is really demonstrative. My specimens were mounted in the strongest glycerine, to which a little acetic acid had been added. I have several excellent preparations from this liver, which have been preserved for years, and some of the drawings of injected ducts and cell-containing network represented may yet be compared with the actual specimens from which they have been copied. The preparations I have figured were selected from a great number, but there was no difficulty in finding many pieces in which the same facts could be demonstrated, though in a more limited extent of tissue. The appearances seem to me to conclusively prove that the view concerning the structure of the liver to which I was led before the year 1855 is correct. Upon this view...
