Excerpt: . . . tries; and the third class is of corresponding members resident in Great Britain and Ireland. These two latter classes are unlimited. , The society has an experimental garden at Kensington, on the south side of the road to Hammersmith, nearly opposite Hollandhouse, which is open to the fellows of the society, from two to six o'clock in each day of the week, except Sundays. The management of this garden is under the direction of a committee, nominated at the first council, after the anniversary. Fellows visiting the garden have the privilege of introducing one or more friends in their company. The increasing funds of the society have enabled it to remove to a very commodious house, in which is a spacious meeting-room, in Jlegcnt- trcct, near Waterloo-place, where proper officers are in daily attendance for transacting business. Having thus stated the objects of the society,...
